Monday morning January 24 1831

Dear Jackson

I have been at Eton for some days with my second son who has been very unwell otherwise I should have seen you or answered your letter which I found last night on my return.

I have heard nothing yet of the restoration save that the report of its being about to take place has got abroad on what foundation however I know not.

I should like much to read over your review of Dr Berenfors infamous book before you go to the country, as no doubt he will through some channel or another attack me if the king acts as he ought towards me. I am persuaded [1] that Mr. Duke of Cumberland underhand is his friend and prompter.

I am going now to the city about my Engine, which I hope will do well. I will call on you tomorrow morning about ½ past 1.

Yours ever most sincerely

Cochrane
